John 14:6, New Living Translation

⁶Jesus told him, "I am the way, the truth, and the life. No one can come to the Father except through me."

When was Miguel born?

When I was in grammar school, I had a friend who was born in Mexico. We'll call him Miguel. He was adopted as a small child after he was found abandoned on the street in Tijuana. The only problem was that no one knew when he was born. So, his new parents gave him a birthday. I don't remember what it was. Let's say it was January 8 – the same as David Bowie, Elvis Presley, and well, Pastor Buzz.

I'm joking about that. But seriously, there is one thing that my buddy Miguel and Jesus Christ have in common – we don't know their true biological birthdays. There are some clues, though, that Jesus was not born on December 25. Consider this passage from the Gospel of Luke, Chapter 2, verses 1 to 12, from the New Living Translation. I have edited this for brevity:

At that time the Roman emperor, Augustus, decreed that a census should be taken throughout the Roman Empire. ³All returned to their own ancestral towns to register for this census. ⁴And because Joseph was a descendant of King David, he had to go to Bethlehem in Judea, David's ancient home. He traveled there from the village of Nazareth. ⁵ He took with him Mary, who was now expecting a child.

⁶ While they were there, she gave birth to her firstborn son. She wrapped him snugly and laid him in a manger, because there was no lodging available for them.

⁸ That night there were shepherds staying in the fields nearby, guarding their flocks of sheep. ⁹ Suddenly, an angel of the Lord appeared among them, and the radiance of the Lord's glory surrounded them. They were terrified, ¹⁰ but the angel reassured them. "Don't be afraid!" he said. "I bring you good news that will bring great joy to all people. ¹¹ The Savior—yes, the Messiah, the Lord—has been born today in Bethlehem, the city of David! ¹² And you will recognize him by this sign: You will find a baby wrapped snugly and lying in a manger."

We just read that there were shepherds staying in the fields when Jesus was born, and from the original Greek it is clear that they were indeed spending their nights and sleeping in the fields - and they did not usually do this in December. Even the sheep might not have been out at night in the winter: the shepherds often found shelter for them. Back then, sheep and other animals sometimes stayed in people's houses, on the bottom floor, while the humans slept in a second-floor loft that overhung the ground floor where the animals lived. The humans climbed a ladder to their rooms up in the loft, and they could walk to the balcony to check up on the animals. Those animals were their livelihoods and had to be protected.

There's more possible evidence that Jesus was not born on December 25th. In Chapter 2 of Luke, we're told that Joseph and Mary went to Bethlehem, where Jesus was born, because the Roman government had decreed that there would be a census. But because the Roman roads were mostly dirt and would be in very poor condition at that time of year, and because temperatures were often below freezing at that time, historians do not believe that censuses were taken in the winter. Mary, who was pregnant, walked there – the distance is 70 miles.

There's another complication. Jesus and his parents were in Bethlehem for a census, supposedly. However, historians have not been able to nail down exactly what census Luke was writing about. The ones that are documented to have happened around this time do not mesh with the timeline in the Gospels.

Of course, though, the point is not when he was born, but that he was indeed born. The date of his birth is not the issue, of course. His birthday isn't even stated in the Bible. The date of the 25th of December was chosen far after he was crucified and resurrected. We'll get back to this.

There was a Roman official named Pliny – actually, he was called Pliny the younger – who was the governor of a Roman province around the year 110 A.D., seventy or eighty years after Jesus was crucified. There is a famous letter that Pliny wrote to the Emperor at the time; the emperor was named Trajan. Pliny was asking Trajan for advice on how to deal with those upstart Christians who were beginning to make waves. Pliny was putting Christians on trial for refusing to worship Roman gods. The punishment was execution. What's intriguing is that, in this letter to the Emperor, Pliny admits that the Christians weren't really doing anything wrong. His main concern was that Christianity was a rapidly growing threat to Roman rule. Remember that Romans considered their emperor to be a god – so refusing to honor Roman gods was a challenge to Roman authority. Pliny refers to Christianity as a “depraved, excessive superstition”. Here is a quote from this letter addressed by Pliny to the Emperor explaining why he is looking for help: For the matter seemed to me to warrant consulting you, especially because of the number involved. For many persons of every age, every rank, and also of both sexes are and will be endangered. For the contagion of this superstition has spread not only to the cities but also to the villages and farms.

This is what we are celebrating this evening: a man who was also God, and who refused to allow mere humans to raise themselves up to the same level of authority as God. The faith he let loose spread like a contagion. We're here welcoming into this world a baby who was born under very humble circumstances, but who later proclaimed: “I am the way, the truth, and the life. No one can come to the Father except through me.”

One more historical note: One of the reasons I've used the New Living Translation in our quote from Luke is that it is probably more accurate than other translations. The NLT says that Jesus was laid in a manger “..because there was no lodging available”. Other translations say that “there was no room in the inn”. Inn is not the right translation of the original Greek. The word that is used in Luke is “katalyma”, and usually referred to a guest room, not an inn. It was mistranslated long ago, and this has led to the belief that Jesus was born in a barn. Most likely, Mary and Joseph were staying in a house. And it’s probably true that the guest room was in the home of Joseph’s relatives in Bethlehem, where they would naturally have sought lodging in Bethlehem. That house happened to be full of other visiting relatives because of the census. That meant that the living space for the humans – up in the loft – was full. So, Mary and Joseph had to sleep downstairs, in the house, where the animals were often kept in the winter. It’s wasn’t even an insult to put them there. Poor people, those who lived on the land and raised animals, often stayed with those animals. Jesus slept in a manger, a feed trough for animals, but in a house, not a barn.

Jesus taught us much: that humans are not Gods, that we should be humble like children, that we should love our enemies, that with God all things are possible, that Jesus came to Earth to serve us, that the humble will be exalted, that we should embrace those who are marginalized, and that our sins are forgiven. We don’t know exactly when he was born - but he scared the crap out of the Roman Empire, which, at its peak, spread from what is now the British Isles to north Africa. And that was only the start of the Christian faith.

I'd like to get back to my buddy, Miguel. I remember one day in the schoolyard him being tormented by other kids. He had been asked in class what his birthday was so that it could be recorded in the school records. He had innocently said that he was adopted, and that since they didn't know his birthday, they had given him the birthday of January 8th. (Again, I'm making that day up.) Then later, at recess, he was taunted. Maybe you weren't even born, one kid yelled, as he pointed at Miguel, maybe you were made in a factory. This is a silly insult, but it hurt Miguel's feelings badly and he fought to hold back tears.

Some weeks later, I was invited to Miguel's birthday party. His family owned a large lot, and although the town I grew up in, Oxnard, California, is now almost entirely cement, blacktop, glass, and steel, back then, there were still many lemon and orange orchards. There were small farms, growing beans and berries and lettuce. Miguel's family made a little money growing vegetables. After we all sang Happy Birthday to Miguel, we went outside to a large tree on their property. There was a piñata hanging from a branch. We had a great time, getting blindfolded and swinging. When it broke open, we all dove for the candy.

Miguel, as it turned out, was a true Christian: one of the kids he had invited to the party was that bully, the one who had suggested that perhaps he was born in a factory. I was standing near the remains of the piñata when that boy walked up to Miguel. He thanked Miguel for inviting him to the party and he said he was sorry for teasing Miguel. Miguel, in a very adult fashion, held his hand out and shook the bully's hand. Then, using a slang word that had actually been around for decades, but had only recently established itself as a fixture in American vocabulary, that bully said, "Anyhow, I think it's cool that you don't know when you were born." Miguel grinned at that.

I think it's cool that we have a savior whose birthday we don't really know. And I think this is all very deliberate. Indeed, it's that Jesus was born that matters, not when. The earliest Christians did not celebrate his birthday.

Perhaps the earliest documentation that dates Jesus' birth as being on December 25 is from a calendar dated 354 A.D., 350 years or so after Jesus was born. But December 25 was an important day for the Romans. It was a festival day celebrating the sun god Sol Invictus, the "Invincible Sun", which was formalized as a pagan holiday in the year 274. It has been strongly suggested that someone chose December 25 as Jesus' birthday to erase a major pagan holiday.

In the end, it's simply true that the Bible does not tell us what day Jesus was born. But our faith is derived from Scripture. Anything outside of that is not important. We don't care the day on which Jesus was born.

These are some of the names of Jesus, as written in the Bible: Jesus the Christ, Emmanuel, our Lord, the Son of God, the Son of Man, the Logos, the Son of David, the Lamb of God, and the Light of the World. That's whose birth we celebrate on a day the choice of which is, well, quite undocumented. And maybe it's great that his birthday was perhaps chosen to displace a pagan holiday. After all, Jesus was a rabble-rouser – and we are proud of that.
